The reason for doing a case-control study is to see if there is a link between a specific disease and certain circumstances (risk factors). A case-control study only makes sense in situations when a specific cause is suspected and so-called controls without the disease are rare. If a person who is doing a case-control study wants to look at a set of risk factors (or exposure) that may be responsible for causing a disease, it makes sense to study only those people with the disease. Otherwise, it might be difficult to find those people who are at risk for the disease and have the same risk factors as the

Q: Rails List User's Favourites From Other Model I currently have a controller that provides a list of users who is friends with a certain user. This is done by returning the list of users in their friendships and writing some code to make sure that the current user is included in that returned list. I would like to change this controller action so that it does not require me to specify which user to send the friend list too. For example, instead of sending the user with a user_id I send them the "list" of users:

def friend_list @current_user = current_user @friends_by_user = User.where(:friend_id => @current_user)

Which returns a list of objects like: [# , # , # ] Is it possible for me to send this list to the current user? How would I do that? A simple foreach loop is obviously not going to work as it will try to loop over the list returned by the SQL query, it just needs to be iterated over.

A: You could make use of the fact that `Array#inject()` returns an array

When I want to talk about a type in this "class", I make it an instance of  $T[U]$ . Is that the correct usage to use, or should I say  $T[U]$  or  $(T[U])[L]$  or something like that. Or is it completely different? How to define the class when I have a method "foo"? A: You should say  $T[U]$ , but you can also write it as  $(T[U])[L]$ , which is maybe clearer. If you mean  $foo(T[U])$  then you can do that, but if T isn't a class but something that would represent a class (like  $T = Set$ ), the resulting  $T[U]$  is a type constructor of type  $Set[U]$ . You can even do that in a way that tells that  $Set[U]$  is a superclass of  $T[U]$  (for example,  $Set[U]$  Kaulenmatten The Kaulenmatten (also written Kaulenmatte; N
